The Guinea Coast, stretching from present-day Senegal to Cameroon, was a hub of commercial activity during the early modern period. European traders flocked to the region in search of gold, ivory, slaves, and other valuable commodities. In exchange, they brought manufactured goods, weapons, and ideas that transformed the lives of the local people.

Through a meticulous examination of the archaeological record, the author reveals the intricate networks of trade that crisscrossed the Guinea Coast. He shows how these networks connected coastal communities with inland markets and extended far into the interior of Africa. The author also explores the role of local traders, who played a crucial role in facilitating the flow of goods and ideas.

Beyond the realm of commerce, the author delves into the cultural and social transformations that accompanied early modern trade on the Guinea Coast. He examines the ways in which European goods and ideas influenced local customs, beliefs, and political systems. He also explores the impact of the slave trade on the region, shedding new light on the horrors of this tragic chapter in human history.

Life, Death, and Early Modern Trade on Africa's Guinea Coast is a major contribution to the study of African history and the global economy. It offers a fresh perspective on the region's rich past and challenges traditional narratives about Africa's role in world history. This book is essential reading for anyone interested in the history of Africa, the slave trade, or the global economy.
